When I was in my early teens, I was taken to a spectacular show on ice by the mother of a friend. Looked around at the luxury of the rink, my friend's mother remarked on the "plush" seats we had been given. I did not know what she meant, and being proud of my vocabulary, I tried to infer its meaning from the context. I can tell of from the tone of her voice that "plush" was clearly intend as a positivity evaluation. So I started to use the word. Yes, I replied, they certainly are plush, and so are the ice rink and the costumes of the skaters, aren't they? My friend's mother was very polite to correct me, but I could tell from her expression that I had not understand the word quite right.

1. _____
 2. _____
 3. _____
 4. _____
 5. _____

Often we can indeed infer from the context what a word roughly means, and that is in fact the way which we usually acquire both new words and new meanings for familiar words, specially in our own first language. But sometimes we need to ask, as I should have asked for "plush", and this is particularly true in the study of a foreign language. If you are surrounded by speakers of the language you are learning, you can ask them direct, but often this opportunity does not exist for the learner of English. So dictionaries have been developed to mend the gap.

6. _____
 7. _____
 8. _____
 9. _____
 10. _____
